19. Halo Crater

After sampling at Sharp Crater the astronauts ran in the direction of Halo Crater where the astronauts took a double core sample using two tubes, each 35-cm long, that were screwed together to make a rod that sampled to twice the usual depth. The double core sample allowed scientists to examine the deeper layers of the lunar regolith.

After pushing in the core tube as far as he could, Bean switched to hammering it into the surface. Hammering with the head of the hammer did not work very well because it was easy to miss, but Bean found that rotating the hammer 90 degrees
